Check out more screensavers at: The Science Behind How Dogs Talk — It's not only for fun. Learn what makes your dog's voice sound like a treat. In the true spirit of science, we're going to have a frank and open conversation about how dogs talk. Can you talk like a dog? Most likely, no. But that doesn't mean you can't mimic a canine's unique communication system, because the science of how dogs talk is pretty fascinating. I'll cover some of the basics, but this video is really about getting your mind around the idea of how dogs vocalize, how sounds are organized, and how they make sense. Understanding this fundamental science will put you in a better position to know how to communicate with your dog — and also if your dog is communicating with you. One of the most interesting things I've discovered is how consistent the overall vocalizations are, which really puts into question the idea that individual sounds are really a means to an end. Do they serve a purpose, or is it just a way to make up the sound system? I'm also going to cover what I consider to be three essential elements of dog vocalizations: the direct sound of the dog, the echo of the dog's sound, and the sound that gets carried away by the environment and into the air — or in this case, into the water. Why I think dogs use the concepts of direct sound, echo, and airborne sound is a little difficult to explain, but basically, they are using the same concepts that we use. It's just that in our case, the concepts are modified to fit our language, and therefore sound a little different. This may be a little tricky to understand, so I'd really appreciate it if you�

I also know that you can set an extern variable to a global value at the same time as declaring a function. Question: Given the following code (pseudocode, C code, just for the sake of the question) int foo(); int bar(); int bar(int x) { return foo(x); } Is there any reason for using or not using 'extern' on the declaration of foo()? Just to add, I've always been told to use extern on a function when the function is only defined by another module, but I have not found any source (on SO or Google) that actually tells me why to do it. A: As it is defined in the C11 standard, an extern declaration allows the compiler to reserve the name in another translation unit. This is useful if you want the compiler to resolve the name automatically in any translation unit that includes a function definition for the name. You can use extern declaration in any translation unit, it does not need to be the unit that actually defines the function. You use extern to make the compiler find the function declaration. The definition of the function is another matter. If you include a header file that does not declare a function, you might include the header file more than once, and the compiler will not find the declaration if the header is included more than once. If you include a header file that has both declarations of the same function, the compiler should complain about that. In those cases, you need to use extern to avoid using the definition of the function in the header file more than once. 81e310abbf
